Each year there are many with the desire to be a majorette in high school. Most plan to audition for the majorette squad without considering the possibility of what may happen if the student does not make the squad. I recommend that any student taking an audition should sit down and talk with their parents through all of the potential scenarios. Any audition process can bring on added stress and pressure to the student. The audition process at NRH has been pre-planned to ensure that we have the best possible candidates to add a quality visual artistry to the musical element which is the total marching band. Many students ask "what happens if I don't make the squad?" This is something that only you and your parents can answer before committing to audition for the squad. I can assure you that it will probably affect your feelings more than it will your future career. Frankly, I hardly know a majorette who hasn't been turned down by a school, a college, or a band program of some sort. The most important thing is that you have decided to take a step toward fulfilling a personal goal. History tells us that, as an artist, you will face the unfavorable end of auditions far more often than the favorable end. It's part of the system. Little good comes from fretting over it. None of the judges stand to gain anything from not selecting a student who auditions. Remember, that the judges are going to select what is best for the band. The final decision is always up to the band director.

Thank you for your interest in trying out for the "Red Diamond" majorette squad and I wish you all the best in your endeavor.

Edward J. Woodis M.A. Ed Director of Bands and Orchestra, NRH
